Customer Reviews

This story has a interesting twist to it. Kathy is a plain Jane, curvy but overweight, shy, and unmemorable. She wears clothes hiding her body. At a sales convention, when her suitcase doesn't arrive, the sexy one she borrows displaying her awe-inspiring cleavage attracts all kinds of attention. Responding, she flirts back, says her name is Kate, and in a room full of strangers and casual acquaintances, no one realizes she's Paul's wife. Finally, a guy propositions her. He thinks she's a hooker. Paul realizes this whole thing turns him on. And Kathy -- now Kate -- thinks it's a lot of fun; she feels like Joan from "Mad Men", who re-introduced America to the 1960s-era appeal of sex bombs like Marilyn Monroe. They decide they'll do it again the next year, and so begins their hotwife adventure. At the next convention, Kathy, armed with a suitcase full of expensive lingerie, hot cocktail dresses, skimpy bikinis, and started working out, turns into the sexy, single, and unbelievably stacked vamp Kate, the target of every man's lust. And like a Mad Men character, she starts drinking martinis. Like a lot of Arnica Butler's voyeur husbands, Paul is an emotional basket case, torn between his anxiety and his arousal at his wife's behavior. Butler writes this from the male point of view but doesn't do that all that well. Paul frantically dashes around trying to follow Kate. He's panic-attack nervous. He always seems to be stumbling somewhere in a near-blind frenzy. And he obsesses in a way more characteristic of women than of men, as he analyzes and re-analyzes and overanalyzes every inflection in every word she says. His brain nearly blows up repeatedly as he decides he wants out of this experiment - except that, maybe he doesn't.
